

Territorial Evolution, 1889

Abstract

In 1889, Ontario is enlarged west to Lake of the Woods and north to the Albany River. The southwestern boundary of Keewatin is adjusted to conform with boundaries of the districts created in 1882.

Canada's long and diversified settlement history is reflected in the two distinct patterns of boundaries that differentiate between eastern and western Canada. The eastern boundaries closely conform to natural features such as drainage basins, while the boundaries of western and northern Canada reflect the administrative organisation of these lands by, first, the Hudson's Bay Company and later the Government of Canada.

Canada

By 1889, the Ontario-Manitoba boundary dispute had been settled, with the disputed area going to Ontario.

Ontario

Between Ontario and Manitoba, there was still a disputed area of territory (that included the towns of Prince Arthur's Landing and Kenora), in which more and more people were settling. There had been an attempt to settle the dispute in 1878. Three arbitrators had been chosen. Their conclusions, called the Award, had been accepted by the province of Ontario, but the federal government had not passed the required laws, so the Award was not binding.

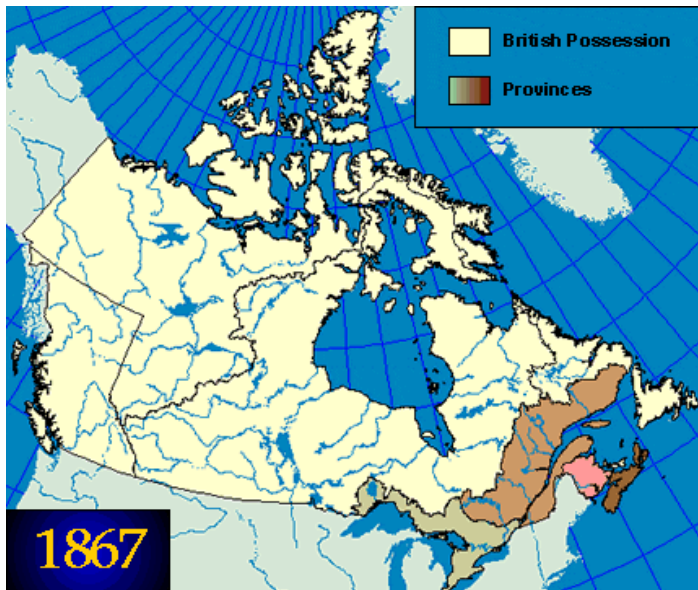

In 1880, the province of Manitoba extended its boundaries, and the federal government confirmed them in 1881. But the province of Ontario did not agree with these boundaries which were described as extending to the boundaries of Ontario, because Ontario officials believed that recognizing these boundaries would, in effect, give the disputed area to Manitoba.

There were two major reasons that made the disputed area attractive to both provinces. The first was the port on Lake Superior, and the second was the timber in the area. Because of the dispute, there was a lot of confusion in the area. Rat Portage, a town in the area claimed by Ontario, was incorporated as a Manitoba town in 1882. The government of the area was completely confused: it was hard to find out who had title to land, there were no civil courts, there was no registry office to record deeds, and there was no timber agent to protect the forest.

The dispute was finally brought to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In 1884, this Committee decided that the 1878 Award was just, so it was incorporated into the Canada (Ontario Boundary) Act of 1889. The boundary of Ontario was extended west to Lake of the Woods, and north to the Albany River.

Animation of the territorial evolution of Canada from 1867 to 1999

The animation, Territorial Evolution 1867 to 1999_e.gif is located in the animated gif folder.

Canada's boundaries are dynamic political structures that reflect the changing political, economic and cultural conditions of the country through time. This animation shows sequentially the history of boundary changes in Canada from Confederation to the creation of Nunavut.
